On a dark winter's night, the captain of the Sea Breeze had the misfortune of sailing through the year's most ferocious storm. As he sailed towards the lighthouse to safety, the shoreline disappeared behind the heavy rain. His crew were in complete dismay and the deck was in disarray from the jostling of the waves. The lighthouse keeper disliked what he had seen and decided to contact the captain through the radio. He gave the instruction for them to drop anchor and wait out the storm in the bay before continuing into the harbour. The captain, however, misunderstood the instructions and veered towards the rocks. He had misjudged the turn and scraped the bow of the ship as it passed too closely to the rocks.
